

Sheridan, Philip H.

Philip Henry Sheridan, b. Albany, N.Y., Mar. 6, 1831, d. Aug. 5, 1888, an aggressive soldier during the U.S. CIVIL WAR, later became general in chief of the U.S. Army. After clerking in a store, he entered (1848) the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. He was suspended for participating in a fracas but graduated in 1853 and served for nearly 9 years on the frontier.

When the Civil War began, Sheridan served as federal quartermaster in southwestern Missouri and participated in the advance by Henry HALLECK on Corinth, Miss., in the spring of 1862. As a division commander he held his position against Confederate attacks at Perryville, Ky. (October 1862), and at Stones River, Tenn. (December 1862-January 1863). He was unable to maintain his lines at CHICKAMAUGA in September 1863 but redeemed himself in November by storming Missionary Ridge at Chattanooga (see CHATTANOOGA, BATTLES OF), where his combativeness and leadership qualities attracted the favorable attention of U.S. Gen. Ulysses S. GRANT.

In early 1864 Grant brought Sheridan east as commander of the Army of the Potomac's cavalry, which Sheridan reorganized. After fighting in the WILDERNESS CAMPAIGN (May 1864), he made a partially successful raid near Richmond, Va., that captured supplies and resulted in the death of the dynamic Southern cavalry leader J. E. B. STUART. In command of the Army of the Shenandoah during the autumn of 1864, following successes at Winchester, Fisher's Hill, and Cedar Creek, Sheridan finally pushed Jubal EARLY's Confederate forces out of Virginia's Shenandoah Valley. Rejoining Grant and George G. MEADE, he scored significant victories at Five Forks and Saylor's Creek (both in Virginia) in the spring of 1865, thereby helping to compel Confederate general Robert E. Lee to surrender.

Following the war Sheridan served (1867) along the Rio Grande. After being relieved (1867) of his post as military governor of Louisiana and Texas because of excessive harshness, he led (1868-69) a series of campaigns against the Indians in the West and accompanied (1870) the Prussian army as an observer during the Franco-Prussian War. He was general in chief from 1883 until his retirement in 1888. His Personal Memoirs was published in 2 volumes in 1888.
